A necessary or irrelevant event in endotoxin shock? Studies of granulocyte chemotaxis in vivo have been hampered by the lack of a standardized system. A recently devised endotoxin-induced granulocytosis model was used to evaluate the chemotactic response in vivo. The data demonstrate that endotoxin stimulates a chemotactic response in vivo in a predictable and reproducible manner, and that this response is inversely related to circulating granulocyte counts. Granulocytes chemotact in vivo and must be dysfunctional. Granulocytes of normal rabbits exhibit chemotactic behavior. These results emphasize
