Thousands of New York City residents may be overpaying for their water as city officials are yet to provide a comprehensive analysis of the state's water supply. NEW YORK — Nine million New York City residents will overpay for water thanks to several cost-cutting measures rolled out by the city in April, according to a new study by the Citizens Union Foundation, a good government advocacy group. But instead of condemning the city for its cost-cutting measures, it should instead be commended as a critical move in addressing the city's fiscal crisis that has yet to run its course. The cap on the City Water Authority's (CWA) distribution rate charged to each customer was frozen last year as the agency grappled with massive budget shortfalls, but the rate was just raised more than 10 percent from January to March, exacerbating the problem. Though the rate increase is not a mandate under state law, the agency had plans to raise its rates by as much as 34 percent. "This move could cost New York City taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars over the next three years," said John Kaehny, executive director of the advocacy group. "The CWA should be commended for doing something about the fact that City residents are already paying too much for water." Last May, Mayor de Blasio signed legislation that would authorize the city to impose a mandatory 14 percent rate hike for the CWA customers, and would guarantee no rate increase for the next three years. Critics at the time argued that the rate increase was not a mandate under
