TRUTH JUZ AMMA 30 SUMBER FOT : Pinterest In order to assess the relative importance of the factors causing scarring in humans, the histological and ultrastructural appearances of scars were compared with the site of new blood vessel formation in normal skin. The histological results showed that new capillary formation (angiogenesis) in vitro is predominantly due to the migration of capillary precursors along veins. Evidence to the contrary is the formation of new blood vessels after the surgical excision of a wide area of epidermis which results in the loss of a rich supply of blood from the veins, and the formation of new capillaries in skin following the passage of an irritating agent. The ability of certain peptides to promote angiogenesis in vitro was studied using the chick chorioallantoic membrane assay. Five peptides were tested: calcitonin, substance P, bombesin, pituitary adenylate cyclase activating peptide, and vasoactive intestinal polypeptide. All showed angiogenic activity although substance P was the most active compound. These results suggest that angiogenesis in vivo is mediated by a mixture of angiogenic and other peptides. Cytokines and their receptors in hematopoietic cell development. Cytokine-cytokine receptor interactions shape hematopoietic stem cell (HSC) development, and provide a means to guide HSCs to and into the hematopoietic microenvironment. To date, 41 cytokines and 41 cytokine receptors have been identified. Transient increases of cytokines near birth can activate stem cells, but more sustained exposure to cytokines can induce differentiation. Some of the
