Sort:Â Most popular to least popular. Last updated on April 7, 2017..Comparative analysis of three lumbar interbody fusion surgical techniques: A human cadaveric study. To compare anterior lumbar interbody fusion (ALIF) with limited discectomy to TLIF with limited discectomy and TLIF with a bilateral pedicle screw and rod fixation (BPSR) for the number of grafts and other parameters to determine if one surgical approach is superior.

Cadaveric lumbar interbody fusion was performed in 24 fresh cadaveric specimens, including 12 ALIFs, 12 TLIFs and one TLIF with BPSR. We measured the number of interbody grafts required, the amount of the bone grafting material and the amount of autologous bone harvested. The interbody cage height was measured at surgery and the cadaveric specimens were subjected to computed tomography scans both pre- and post-operatively. Post-operative computed tomography scans were used for post-operative implant and fusion analysis. The TLIF specimens used BPSR. We found a significantly higher level of discectomy in the ALIF specimens compared to the TLIF specimens. The mean number of grafts required was greater for the ALIF specimens and decreased as the level of ALIF increased. The TLIF specimens required fewer grafts. The amount of bone grafting material required to perform a TLIF procedure was higher than the amount of bone grafting material required for the same level of discectomy to perform an ALIF procedure. The TLIF procedure with BPSR required more interbody cage height than the two TLIF procedures. We found a greater amount of bone graft for the ALIF specimens. The TLIF specimens required fewer grafts, and the TLIF specimens with BPSR required more bone grafting. The TLIF specimens with BPSR required the greatest height of an interbody cage. We found no statistically significant differences between ALIF and TLIF for all parameters measured. There is no difference

"If you can hold your(CNN) Ed Miliband has accused the banks of putting profit ahead of ordinary families' concerns about their deposits and called for a "new modern banking system." Speaking at a fringe event organized by the Society of Business Service Providers at the Conservative Party conference on Thursday morning, the Labour leader made a speech in which he said the financial crisis of 2008 had helped those at the top, but not those struggling to get on. He listed the failures of mortgage-backed securities, the mismanagement by the banks leading to the financial crisis and the inadequate response to the crisis. "We did need a banking system that was strong enough to help us at the time, but we did not need a banking system that was designed to be the handmaiden to the wrong people and the right people," he said. "We did not need a banking system that was so close to the commercial establishment, and to the governing establishment and to the political establishment, it was all of our time." 'Jobs cannot be done on the cheap' Miliband attacked the banks that were rescued by the taxpayer during the financial crisis, saying he had seen what had gone on over the last five years in the City of London. "This is a banking system that is not living up to the standards that the public would expect," he said. "It is unacceptable for this banking system to be propping up a debt overhang that has created unnecessary risk and put jobs and livelihoods at risk. "It is unacceptable for banks to be paid better than they are worth. It is unacceptable for jobs to be done on the cheap." The Labour leader reiterated his calls for a new future-proof banking system, saying it was important to set aside the past. He also spoke in favor of a shared bank with all the savings of Britain's working people, and for the banks themselves to be held to account in an international forum. 'Save the taxpayers' money' Miliband said his
