The Federal Trade Commission has charged Grupo Android with including spyware in devices that claimed to be offers of free apps. Grupo Android is accused of tricking consumers into downloading the software from apps stores in order to gain access to devices and gather personal information. The FTC said Google Play store apps created by Grupo Android fooled users into believing they would get popular mobile apps, such as games, free of charge. The Spanish company denied the allegations and said it will “vigorously defend” itself. Grupo Android offered users free Android apps “in order to develop increased market share within the mobile operating system,” the FTC said in a press release. But the software, which was downloaded tens of millions of times since its debut in the fall of 2016, was instead used to spy on consumers, the FTC charged. “Consumers should not have to jump through deceptive hoops just to access popular apps or other content,” FTC Chairman Joe Simons said in the release. “Consumers are entitled to a fair deal when they shop for goods and services. This is not one of those deals.” The FTC alleged Grupo Android convinced consumers to download its software through apps listed in Google Play's catalog, promising that installation of the apps would be “free,” would “remain free for life,” and that users would be able to download more apps after paying for the first one. Grupo Android even claimed that it had “thousands” of “popular” apps in its catalog, while it had only a handful of users. “Consumers’ personal information, such as telephone numbers, location, and text messages, were allegedly stored on the company’s servers,” the FTC said. The FTC alleged that Grupo Android’s software was created to gather consumers’ personal information. The company’s spyware collected users’ device identifiers, other information, such as users’ location data, and all text messages sent or received on the devices. FTC officials said they obtained a search warrant for Grupo Android’s servers and found that it stored all of the personal information gathered, including the number of times each app was downloaded and the amount of time it was used. According to the FTC, Grupo Android was able to gather
