In Retirement**Related research article** Sassino G, Finitell J, Witte K, Petersen R, Baranski B. 2019. Dynamics of TNF family signaling in **I**volution in the immune system of primates. *eLife* **8**::e03703. doi: [10.7554/eLife.03703]( Usually when we think about 'cell communication', we think about chemical 'wiring' in the form of hormones, neurotransmitters, or other signaling molecules. These molecules are secreted and diffuse through the body, making up a fluid in which they may speak to each other and regulate other molecules in the interior of a cell. In this way, chemical signaling tunes things up or down and wires them together in very powerful ways. Yet other molecules are also capable of forming highly structured networks in the form of intricate arrays of cells called tissues. Many of these cells are 'plugged-in' to each other, each sending and receiving chemical signals in a sophisticated way. The cells will carry out specific functions in concert, and may even recruit peripheral tissues to help out with a particular task. Although these can be cell-type specific, they often have much broader roles and can affect many other tissues. The cells that make up these dynamic networks are usually considered static and unchanging. However, recent work has shown that some cells can, under certain conditions, do much more than just sit still. They can change shape, alter their overall size, proliferate, and migrate through the tissue. All of these activities regulate the activity of other, more static cells and the overall architecture, strength, stability and, importantly, function of the tissue ([@bib4]). Fifty years ago the first cells of the immune system were discovered, and they all followed a very similar pattern. In mammals, the original cell types include the chemokine-releasing dendritic cells, the B cells that produce antibodies, and the T cells, which act as a 'line of defence' that recognize foreign tissues and migrate to them. Most of the components of the immune system are in one location and surrounded by a mostly static extracellular matrix (ECM). The cells carry out their various tasks on their own, as if they were just sitting on or next to each other and calling out to each
