Movement Definition The Movement, formally named the Centroamerican Movement (Movimiento Centroamericano), is the greatest current Nicaraguan protest movement. It is best known for its initial demand that President Daniel Ortega leave office, although it has been expanded to include a broad range of reform grievances. In an early 2005 poll of Nicaraguans, 41% of respondents said the Movement should be considered a legitimate opposition party and 39% said it was "not a legitimate opposition party". The Movement grew from the Sandinista National Liberation Front's (FSLN) Sandinista Renovation Movement, a broad range of popular movements in the country that had led to reduced poverty levels and improved health care and education since 1979. It has included both sectors of civil society, as well as political forces and political parties. In April 2007, Violeta Chamorro, leader of the FSLN, for the first time mentioned the word "movimiento", in a speech at a conference about democratization in Latin America held in Montevideo. The term was used again on July 12, 2007 at the FSLN national convention; although at the same time, the Movement was still described as an "interim electoral committee". The Movement saw its first major demonstrations on March 19, 2007, when it joined over one hundred other organizations for a protest on International Women's Day. Since then, hundreds of thousands of Nicaraguans have been involved in the Movement, and it continues to be a political force in the country. The Movement also attracts support and participation from Nicaraguan immigrants in the United States.

Etymology The name of the Movement dates to the first public statement of the FSLN in April 1987, declaring its intent to transform the Sandinista Renovation Movement into "a popular democratic process." The word "movimiento" (as in "movimiento popular") literally means "movement" in Spanish. Some had theorized that the initial use of the word was intended to symbolize an end to violence and repression, which had plagued the FSLN for many years. According to Reporters without Borders, the name "is meant to reflect the broad nature of support it has received". The Sandinistas formally adopted the name "Centroamerican Movement" in a January 2, 1988, resolution during the Seventh Party Conference. Nicaraguan journalist Patricio Arias explained
