Our previous study has shown that mice overexpressing the human TGFbeta3 isoform in their airways develop a progressive, type 2-like phenotype of pulmonary airway smooth muscle cells (PASMCs) in which proliferation decreases and the functional contractile phenotype predominates. To further characterize the PASMC phenotype change during this process, we examined the expression of contractile protein, its myofibrillar organization and TGFbeta signaling molecules using immunohistochemistry, immunoblotting and the mRNA profile using real-time RT-PCR in wild-type PASMC, TGFbeta-null PASMC and their transgenic counterparts. In TGFbeta-null PASMC, myofibrillar proteins were not altered. However, in TGFbeta3 transgenic mice, PASMCs showed a myofibrillar organization with a circular pattern similar to that in normal lung PASMCs, as demonstrated by immunofluorescence. They also displayed the increase of myocardin, calponin and alpha-actin mRNAs, and a progressive increase
