What's new:

Vol. 2 The Fabulous Fear Machine is a 3-volume bibliography of work published in British pulp magazines and similar publications in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s by Graham Parker, who went on to have a successful career as a comedian and playwright in Britain. It covers work in the science fiction and fantasy fields, mostly in the 1950s and 1960s, and contains a long introduction by the author, stating his intentions and introducing his list of contributors. The course of the lists lead from topics with which the author had become familiar as a reader, to bloodier ones, to topics more likely to be new to readers. The term "bloodier" refers to more violent and often better written stories with a villain having much more impact - the most bloodily written stories in the volume are Tower of Fear and Night of the Demons (both by Phillip MacDonald). With a few exceptions, the stories are usually between fifty and eighty pages in length. This is typical for the period, and also more than enough for the reader to digest. As a result, this fanzine feels more like a collection of comic strips and essays, than a traditional magazine, although they can be enjoyed in either respect. One of the volumes contains a short comic strip, "The Dying Race", which featured a self-contained heist fiction. Another volume includes a variety of fiction from around the world, starting with a contemporary family story and ending with a separate story from Greece and then a picture story in the Far East. Many of the larger pulp magazines were put out in editions, many of which are included in the bibliography, and it may be the case that the unedited magazine may have had content increased from those that appear on the published lists. There may also be differences in style, but they share the basic themes and story structures of the pulp magazines. Largely the work is produced by The House of Fear, which many people seem to have pronounced as "The House of Fear" and mistakenly referred to, such as 'The house of fear is publishing'. Contents Introduction: Looking at the Greatness Several pages, recounting the author's activities and thoughts as he went through the volumes, interspersed with bits of news about the house. The profile of the author, and the writing he feels he is most suited to: superhero stories, crime and detective tales, murder mysteries, and horror stories. He also looks at his past
