Q: Under certain condition, does Delphi have to allocate memory for that? I'm wondering about this in the following code:

function A: function;
begin Result := B; end;
function B: function;
begin Result := C; end;
function C: function;
begin Result := D; end;
if A then a := A;
//OK but a points to nowhere
The result of A has to be pointing to nowhere, but I found this in the documentation (Edit: This is a Delphi's own language reference):
If a function's body contains no return

statement and the function is not declared as an inline function, then the final line of a function must be a return statement. [..]

The "no return statement" can be omitted from the A function body, however. Thus, it seems like Delphi does not require any extra memory for that at all. But how about allocating memory for the result? It's a little bit about the compiler's technical detail. A:

This is the relevant part of the "raw" specification for RTTI. The only thing that's important in this case is the last line of any given method which must return the result.

This can, indeed
