Osteoporosis is a disease characterized by an increased vulnerability of bone to fracture. The most common type of osteoporotic fracture is that of the spine and hip. With the progressive aging of Western population osteoporosis will become one of the most frequent diseases in the world. The purpose of the paper is to define the epidemiology, physiopathology, clinical presentation and therapy of osteoporosis in elderly men. We present papers from literature and scientific papers already published. The most important results about osteoporosis in elderly men are described, in relation to the results described in the same diseases in women. The prevalence of osteoporosis in elderly men appears to be lower than in women, probably because of the absence of a peak in the natural history of the disease in males. Prevalence increases with age, and the risk of fracture increases with falling or a low-trauma (four-step fractures) fracture. Diagnosis of osteoporosis is not a clinical diagnosis, but must be made by bone densitometry, which will permit an accurate definition of the bone mineral density (BMD) of the lumbar spine and/or the femoral neck. Osteoporosis is a multifactorial disease: the genetic factors include some genes that predispose to the disease (familial pattern), as well as the nutritional and endocrinological ones. The environmental factors include smoking, alcoholism, the use of some drugs (estrogens, glucocorticoids), some diseases (diabetes, rheumatism), etc. Osteoporosis is a disease whose diagnosis is important not only in
