research community for a rapid and efficient method of introducing a new reporter gene into a host cell. For example, one of the most demanding requirements of gene therapy is the development of a system for efficient and widespread delivery of a therapeutic gene into the cells of a patient. Ideally, this would be accomplished by means of recombinant retroviruses or retrovirus-like vectors which are capable of integrating their genetic material into a host cell chromosome and replicating therein to produce sufficient quantities of the therapeutic gene product. Although retroviruses are very efficient gene delivery vehicles, their complex life cycle (which includes the production of virions) necessitates that the infected cells be isolated before the expression of the therapeutic gene is evaluated. Furthermore, retroviruses are likely to be immunogenic and therefore are not well suited for use in humans. There are three approaches which have been attempted in order to circumvent the requirement that retroviruses be isolated before gene expression is evaluated. One approach is to use highly active, replication-defective retroviruses (semi-defective viruses) in conjunction with a suitable host cell. (Keller et al. 1988. In: Gene therapy: A Practical Approach. I. Devita, V. J. Dower, G. F. Engel, Eds. (Plenum Publishing Corporation, New York), p. 411-431; Callahan et al. 1990. Science 249:491-497). A second approach involves the use of retroviruses expressing a selectable marker gene, but not the therapeutic gene (i.e., "gene chimeras" or retroviral vectors) (Shida et al. 1990. Science 249:1215-1217; Wells et al. 1990. Cell 61:503-512; Lewis et al. 1990. Science 248:1447-14
