A new report shows one in four of the world's longest-serving presidents say they are overweight or obese. WASHINGTON — Former U.S. president Jimmy Carter is the obese president of them all. An Oxfam study shows that Carter, born in 1924, is the only one of a dozen longest-serving presidents to be overweight or obese, though nine out of the 12 have not reported their weight to the public. Oxfam's State of the World's Leaders 2010 report says that in the United States, President Barack Obama is the only president or leading politician to be underweight. Carter, who left office after two terms, was most likely an already overweight man in the 1970s, according to Dr. Sin Hang Lee of the Harvard School of Public Health. Lee said Carter probably had slightly low muscle mass and his weight is too high because he likely had an artificially high caloric intake. Obama has a weight of 150 pounds, according to a recent photo of the first family on vacation. Dr. Howard Frumkin, director of the National Institute of Nutrition and professor of medicine at the University of Washington, said Carter's weight is similar to the normal range. "He's a former president. If he had a high calorie intake, he shouldn't be too heavy. That would be the case for just about everybody," Frumkin said. The other overweight presidents are Andrew Johnson, whose year in office was marked by the Civil War, Gerald Ford and William Jefferson Clinton. Gerald Ford is the only president who is not overweight or obese, though the former first lady, Betty Ford, is obese. Bill Clinton is currently obese, but the former president said in a recent interview with CNN that he has lost 40 pounds. But most of the world's leaders are thin, according to the report. International Union of the Food and Allied Workers says the report only includes world leaders from developed countries, excluding leaders from Africa. Based on the International Classification of Occupations, the report says that 66 percent of leaders are thin, 16 percent are overweight and 14 percent are obese. of the bag is created, the leading edge portion of the bag is wrapped around a portion of the drum to form a second adjacent containerized pallet. Role of Oct4 in the differentiation of embryonal carcinoma cells in vitro. Previous studies have demonstrated that Oct4, a transcriptional factor that plays a critical role in maintaining the pluripotent state of embryonic stem cells, is expressed in undifferentiated embryonal carcinoma cells. In the present study, to determine the role of Oct4 in embryonal carcinoma differentiation in vitro, Oct4 expression was knocked down in the NCCIT cell line by using short hairpin RNA (shRNA). Compared to NCCIT cells transfected with control shRNA, those transfected with Oct4 shRNA presented a significant reduction in Oct4 expression. Oct4-knockdown cells presented a significant increase in alkaline phosphatase activity and the expression of definitive endoderm markers, and reduced expression of pluripotency markers and expression of endodermal markers compared to the control NCCIT cells. These results clearly indicate that Oct4 is necessary for the maintenance of the undifferentiated phenotype and the transition from the undifferentiated to the differentiated status of embryonal carcinoma cells. Functional differentiation of the leukocytes is critical for human health. During periods of disease or immune challenge, the interaction between cytokines, lipids, other cells, and the extracellular matrix is essential for the functional changes that occur. Despite intense investigation, the physiologic cues that define where on the cell surface the differentiation signals occur remains poorly understood. The goal of this proposal is to test the hypothesis that a specific protein kinase C-dependent phosphorylation sequence, found in LFA-1, regulates activity of the integrin and the ability of the leukocyte to switch between functional states. Preliminary data suggest that this sequence in LFA-1 coordinates the ability of the integrin to bind to both phospholipids and matrix proteins. The experiments in the proposal are designed to determine which proteins or phospholipids are the physiologic ligands that interact with the protein kinase C-dependent sequence and what is the influence of these ligands on the integrin-integrin interactions, leukocyte adhesion, and other functions. The experiments will test the hypothesis that phosphorylation of the integrin cytoplasmic domain is critical for integrin function. Leukocytes, specifically granulocytes, are particularly attractive models for investigating the roles of the LFA-1 and other integrins because they express a wide spectrum of ligand binding sites, exhibit varied degrees of
