In this procedure, a catheter having an expandable balloon is inserted percutaneously into the cardiovascular system of a patient via the femoral or brachial artery. The catheter is then advanced through the lumen of the coronary arteries until the balloon is positioned across a stenotic lesion. The balloon is inflated to a predetermined size with radiopaque liquid at relatively high pressures (e.g., generally 3 to 12 atmospheres or 33.5 to 126 psi) to press the stenosis into the arterial wall. A coronary angioplasty results in abrupt reopening and increased blood flow through the affected artery. However, abrupt reopening of the artery, or restenosis, can occur in from 25% to 50% of the cases within approximately 6 months, especially in the initial phase after a PTCA. To prevent restenosis, a physician can implant an intravascular prosthesis for maintaining vascular patency, termed a stent, inside the artery at the treatment site. The stent is expanded to a larger diameter for deployment in the vasculature, by a balloon. Once in position, the stent can be deployed and expanded to a larger diameter, by the inflation of the balloon. The deployment of the stent may be accomplished by repeatedly inflating the balloon, to a relatively small diameter, followed by expanding the stent to a larger diameter, using the balloon. In a typical stent deployment procedure, the stent is deployed through the skin and underlying tissue to a region of the blood vessel which has been diseased. The stent is typically delivered on a catheter in a collapsed configuration and is configured to be deployed in a radially expanded configuration when deployed at the treatment site
