This week marks the big seventieth anniversary of the opening of the tunnel linking England to France, making it the longest road tunnel in the world. While many of us have been waving "bravo" and clapping at this long overdue recognition of the engineering and scientific achievement of the pair of French diggers who poured the first concrete to form the foundations for the tunnel and then spent a long time getting it built, how many know what it is exactly that they were digging beneath? Imagine that you’re a digger. You’re working on the undercarriage of one of the great engines of the Second World War. As you dig, you search for one of the most precious of all these engines of war: the payload. It’s an engagement with the air and your life depends on finding it. You know that the hangar in which the payload is stored is about 8ft deep, and rather than dig a very great length of tunnel at once, what you look for is a sort of giant cupboard, like a wardrobe but with a lid and a door or two. So as you dig you look for an opening with two doors in it, rather like the one you found in your wardrobe. You know the others on your side will be searching for the same two doors. And then you find them. And the press of bodies who are searching for the same thing start hammering a path down through the door, and you follow them all the way down, hammer in hand, digging away as you go. This is just what the French have done, and they have done it in the spectacular and astonishingly successful Channel Tunnel. On the 70th anniversary of its opening, we can celebrate the engineering achievement in its own right, and also mark a victory for all the millions of visitors to Britain who have made the Channel Tunnel one of the wonders of the world in recent years. The tunnel was opened by the British and French prime minister

What's new in Childhood Fears:

Are Just that: Things to be Digg at When You are a Child | Something Awful by ashandinchina on March 21st, 2008 “I fear my pillow is wet,” I would say, willy-nilly. “I fear my pillow is wet,” this rich girl would say, and she would go in and cup the pillow with a turned hand and grope its emptiness and stare darkly into the unknown. When you are a child, everything is your responsibility, above all your toys. “Did I leave my buttons on your pathetically cute lunch box?” you realize, with something akin to relish, as you look through the drawer of your aunt’s desk, a drawer filled with toys that frightened you once and seemed so much quieter and cheaper with another child. This is a sober kind of terror, and it’s tempered by having no control over anything at all, not even yourself. Very cute. This is something this 8 year old wrote about fears as a child. They lasted until she was 12 and she grew out of them. chicayoghatMarch 21st, 2008 Well its not THAT scary Viktor3317March 21st, 2008 Ju, the dude is a tool. There are better blogs out there. But great wordplay, heh. Clearance RackMarch 21st, 2008 Maybe he’s wantong us all to feel better about our lives by reading shit. Still, fuck him. What he missed on this is that imaginary fears are just that. You keep imagining them over and over. NO! FUCKING! ONE! TIME! For real? Childhood DreamsMarch 21st, 2008 1) Both parents being totally F’ed up 2) A run-away goat that I never gave any money to sugarladyMarch 21st, 2008 If I can rephrase what was said by one of the dads with the kid on the WaPo website..... It is hard to enjoy and have fun in this past year, knowing that you will be the parent of a kid going through this. “One thing is for sure: It will never be fun to go through this as an adult, and all that goes with it,” the father said.
