Mac OSX. A magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) machine includes a magnet, an RF coil and a computer system to control and analyze the MRI machine. The magnet produces a strong magnetic field within the bore of the MRI machine to polarize hydrogen atoms in the body, which enables various types of diagnostic images to be obtained from the body. The RF coil generates an RF pulse to excite the nuclei in the patient's body that are polarized due to the magnetic field generated by the magnet. An image signal is created by detecting the resulting nuclear magnetic resonance (NMR) signal emitted by the excited nuclei. When the RF coil is connected to the MRI machine, the magnet is energized to run the MRI machine. The power supply of the magnet is also connected to the
