Captains () commonly also known as the Player-In-Charge () is a role in cricket that is typically given to the most senior member of a cricket team, to lead on the field during a match. In some individual fielding positions, the acting captain is deemed to be the player tasked with the responsibility of filling in for the most senior member on that position who has been injured or used as a substitute. The MCC went on to hold the title as Test cricket's official Test captain for over a century. During this period, match captains were picked based on their individual skill as opposed to who would give the best team performance. However, the "MCC's legendary leadership did not involve coaching the great players or recruiting them in particular" and, without the newfangled Indian professional appointment system, once the early English professional class had gotten its feet under the
