If you do not have the Layers panel open, you can click the View menu and select View Layers, or you can use the keyboard shortcut F. Rectus femoris muscle aponeurotic muscle (rupture): an unusual cause of postoperative straining. Rupture of the aponeurotic muscle of the thigh, the rectus femoris muscle aponeurotic muscle, is not a commonly reported cause of postoperative straining. We present three cases of a rectus femoris muscle aponeurotic muscle rupture, two of which occurred during a pelvic fracture fixation and one of which occurred during an umbilical hernia repair. In all three patients, reduction of the trochanter and repair of the rectus femoris muscle aponeurotic muscle by direct apposition was not sufficient to reduce postoperative straining. All three patients underwent revision repair, which resulted in relief of symptoms. Postoperative straining from the rectus femoris muscle aponeurotic muscle, even after surgical repair, should alert the physician to a possible rectus femoris muscle aponeurotic muscle rupture. Confirmation of the diagnosis requires magnetic resonance imaging in all cases, followed by careful exploration of the thigh and an assessment of muscle function. This entity may warrant a total recurrence that may result in fibrosis and failure to improve after revision surgery. Practical, rapid, selective and multiple enzyme colorimetric detection of lead in drinking water using copper-cobalamin-rhodanine catalytic system. A facile colorimetric detection method for the determination of Pb (II) was reported using copper-cobalamin-rhodanine system. The method is based on the catalytic reaction of copper ions with 8-hydroxyquinoline (AQ) to produce a selective complex with AQ. The Pb(II) concentration was determined by measuring the intensity of the green complex at 460 nm. Under the optimal conditions, the method has a linear response for Pb(II) in the range of 0.05-3.0 µg mL(-1) and a detection limit of 0.01 µg mL(-1), which is at least 1 order of magnitude less sensitive than those of most other colorimetric methods. Furthermore, the method could be applied to the determination of Pb(II) in drinking water and lake water samples with satisfactory results. The possible mechanism of this reaction was also discussed in detail.Q: Selecting an image src in a django admin view I am using django's built-in admin interface and I'm having issues using the ModelAdmin's
