Recently released security updates for the Java 7 and Java 6 platforms have enabled attackers to remotely exploit a buffer overflow vulnerability in Java Web Start (JWS) within less than a second. Earlier this year, a new security audit of JWS led by security firm Vulnerability Laboratory, discovered a Java 7 JWS exploit that allowed an attacker to execute arbitrary code within the victim's JWS browser. As researchers from Security Explorations pointed out on Monday, attackers could leverage that vulnerability in their proof of concept (PoC) to attack the network of a company that provides a web portal for a small community. A PoC could be easily shared through an infected JWS browser with no warning, allowing an attacker to bypass the most common security measures. Attackers might use JWS browser to launch an LDAPS attack against corporate network (via a port mapping and not a port redirection), host name or IP spoofing (like in the case of domain name or IP spoofing attacks), execute arbitrary code, gain administrative access, etc., as demonstrated in the video below. The PoC, first seen in February 2017, exploits a vulnerability in the Handling of the presentation of Packages and Plugins (HPP) used in JWS to handle classes. In a PoC, the exploited browser displays a URL with a JWS URL template. When the victim goes to the link, JWS runs, triggering the vulnerability that then allows attackers to inject and execute arbitrary code using Java's Class.forName() method. The vulnerability affects all Java 7 browsers supporting JWS, including the browser used by IBM WebSphere Portal. Vulnerability Lab didn't try to test Java 6 support for JWS. The PoC uses a buffer overflow in the way that Java handles OpenJDK Security (JKS) keystores. As a result of that, if the Java VM is running in the background, attackers can trick the user to click on an executable JAR or a WAR file, that could be used to escalate privilege. Thanks to the simplicity and ease with which the PoC can be shared through USB or infected network drives, similar attacks could be used by the same cybercriminals with little chances of being detected. "The attack is quite simple, only a malicious JAR or JAR archive file is required and that the malicious file is easily accessible," reads the blog post published by Security Explorations. "While JARs that perform bad things are more common

Q: Remove "non-existing" div I have a problem which I cannot solve alone. When I reload the page the div will show but after few reloads the div will disappear and when I reload the page again another div will appear. Now my problem is I want the user to just see one div and after reloading he will see the same div. I hope you can help me. JSFiddle: This is my jquery code: `$(function() { var $first = $(".first").hide(); $(".second").click(function() { $first.toggle(); }); });`; A: After reload, you have to create a new element with id of first and append it to the document. This should work : `$(function() { var $first = $(".first"); $first.hide(); $(".second").click(function() { $first.toggle(); // Create a new element and store it in $first var $div = $("This is first"); $first.append(div); }); });`; Q: how to analyze qqplot in R by using generated data I have generated some data. `set.seed(912)`
