Free Download Friday, April 20, 2010 Selling the movie This is a press release from the Working Group on Arts and Media
(WAR) of the ACM (Association for Computing Machinery).
As far as I understand the message, it says that the ACM is probably planning some changes to its Code of Ethics. One of the changes being considered is to introduce some new vetting process for the deans and editors of ARL Journals. (I recall this being discussed by Linda Friedman who was a member of the Working Group.) I haven't been following this very closely, but it seems to me that if the deans of journals are only listening to requests from the ACM, it might well happen that the ACM runs into situations where it is no longer in a position to demand that a journal change its policies. What happens in these situations is that the ACM then has to promise to sell the movie that it would like to see produced. And so, if a publisher refuses to change its policies, the ACM will simply sue the publisher for copyright infringement, and watch as the movie-buying public eats popcorn in the court room. But wait a minute. The ACM isn't actually a copyright holder, so can't sue anyone. The ACM will have to convince the publisher that it (the ACM) is the owner of the movie, and that the publisher has infringed the copyright by refusing to change their policies. This is a really interesting situation, and shows why the deans of journals need to understand that the ACM is more than an unimportant organization that can be ignored. The ACM plays a very important role in everything the association does, so whatever the ACM thinks it wants the association to do, you might be really surprised where it lands in the end. And so, if you are the dean of a journal, you need to take advice from someone who understands the workings of the ACM.
