the production of excellent polymers, the reactivities should be suppressed as low as possible under the usual polymerization condition, and more particularly if a homopolymer of a high degree of polymerization is obtained, the reactivities should be further suppressed as low as possible. Meanwhile, polyesters such as polyethylene terephthalate (PET) and polybutylene terephthalate (PBT)

are generally obtained through the polycondensation reaction of dicarboxylic acids and polyhydric alcohols. However, such aromatic polyesters have a serious drawback, that is, they are hard to be thermally degradable and chemically degradable. Moreover, such aromatic polyesters have another drawback that their degradation products such as metal salts are somewhat harmful to the environment. As mentioned in the foregoing, polymers are now made from a wide variety of materials, and conventional techniques for the industrial production of polymers are usually based on a strategy to lower the production cost by way of reducing the weight of the polymers while increasing the purity, as well as the quality, of the polymers. However, these techniques have been accompanied by the following problems; namely, the increase in the weight of the polymers has been problematic, and the various processes that are now applied to the industrial production of polymer have been accompanied by a very considerable increase in the production costs. Thus, the object of the present invention is to provide a method for obtaining halogen-containing derivatives of fluorinated polymers at a low cost while eliminating the problems accompanying the conventional techniques, i.e., a method for obtaining halogen-containing derivatives of fluorinated polymers, which can provide halogen-containing derivatives of fluorinated polymers of high quality and at a low cost. The effects of circular breathing on joint positions and inspiratory muscle activity in subjects with and without scapular winging. To determine the effect of circular breathing on joint positions and on activity of the inspiratory muscles in subjects with and without scapular winging. Case-control study. University laboratory. Thirty-one able-bodied subjects (16 men, 15 women) and 10 patients (8 men, 2 women) with traumatic scapular winging. Subjects were classified by the position of the scapular wing: right and left symmetric, and scapular winging. Measurement of: 1) shoulder abduction range, 2) electromyogram (EMG) of the upper trapezius muscles, and 3 6d1f23a050
