When I travel and my work desk is packed away in my hotel room, I spend a lot of time thinking about technology. It's easy to be lulled by the hot Twitter and Facebook feeds or the power of an iPhone camera and being able to share shots right away. All this new technology is wonderful but it's easy to become fixated on it and forget the reason we are all down here in the first place. If we have to leave this world, maybe one of the best ways to do it is to simply disappear and let the internet take care of the laundry and cleaning up your messes for you. The other day I was driving to another trip and listening to NPR. As I was doing my morning check of my iPhone to see what I needed to get the trip started, I was overwhelmed by the amount of information and news that came from the technology that we all have at our fingertips. This is what life looks like in the world of news, especially when we are told that our entire history is on line. We are never more than a click away from being able to know what happened in a past, but we can also be out of touch with what's going on in the present. The trouble for me at the moment is that I have seen all the big headlines and yet there is one that I am not seeing. It is that I am missing the news that the California State University Long Beach has announced a new course on the 'African American Experience'. I'm hoping that this isn't the only course. California State University is one of the most diverse colleges and universities in the country. Yet, there is a lack of focus on the important historical moments of the African American community in the United States. If this is the only course available, I would certainly be watching to see if that changes. I know that I have been comfortable studying these issues in the past. There is much to be learned about the Black experience in this country. If a course like this were being offered elsewhere in the nation, I think it would make the front page of 6d1f23a050
