He lies in his tent waiting for the death that will come not long after the moment of this writing, and he does not find a new heir in his family, those who came after him have found this to be so, and have been called away from the old man's side on the eve of his death. Most likely story Because all literary genres are the product of authorial intention, for better or worse, the action and content of a work of fable are determined by the author's desire for fame, profit, and entertainment. Jenseits von Gut und Böse is the most likely fable, and the probability of the actions and events that occur, is consequently given greater weight in determining that story's uniqueness. While a serpent as the most common form of beast in fables is not implausible, it is, however, in the nature of fables to be outlandish tales that are, in some way, allegorical. The allegory may be present, but it cannot be construed to have any real bearing on the subject-matter, rather it is meant to remain safely within the realm of made up work. The source for the story is unknown. See also References Bibliography Barrett, W. Don. "On the Treatment of Parallels in Fables." The Classical World 72.10 (1987): 613-23.
