for a printer to be detected on your network, it has to have a unique name. the only way to know this is to look at the name of the tcp/ip port associated with the printer. the default port for a laserjet 4000n printer is the port named printserver01. there are about 10 other tcp/ip printer ports on a typical network that can be used for a printer to be detected. there are hundreds of printers that you can choose from so i do not have room to discuss all the possibilities. however, i think that most of us should not have too many problems getting the drivers we need from the following resources: the last step in getting the printer

working is to register the printer with windows. to do this, open the windows device manager and locate the printer. right click on the printer and select properties. windows will then ask if you wish to install the printer drivers. select the option to install drivers. you will then be prompted to insert your hp customer id. then enter the password that you use to access the hp software registration tool. windows will then take you to a confirmation page. click the "next" button and wait for windows to complete the registration. they are designed to work with all the windows pcs that are available. this is because of their compatibility with multiple versions of windows. its meaning is, you can install the printer on any windows pc with a compatible windows operating system. you can also use the printer with windows 98 or windows me as long as it has the appropriate drivers. when your printer model is compatible with windows xp, it will automatically be detected and installed. in case your printer model is not compatible with windows xp, then you need to download the compatible driver. the compatible driver is provided by the manufacturer of your printer.

Hp Laserjet Series Ii Driver Windows 7 Zip

Winkprinting.com created a new way to get HP LaserJet Pro Series II drivers works under Windows 7. Download Windows 7 printer drivers for HP LaserJet Pro 4500 series II - works under Windows 7. The mechanism requires a one-step installation of the WinUSB driver on the Windows 7 workstation and another driver installation on the Windows 7 print server or on the wireless router, if you use the wireless network to print. Winkprinting.com is the developer of the technique. According to the company, the HP LaserJet Pro 4500 series II is the first printer that has been able to recognize the operating system of the print server and to print properly. When a computer prints a file from the network with the HP LaserJet Pro 4500 series II, the document is printed from a PC connected to the print server (or connected via wireless router) which recognizes the operating system of the client computer and performs the appropriate HP LaserJet Pro 4500 series II driver installation. The resulting printer settings are stored in the registry on the print server so that they can be accessed by other computers. These settings include the default printer driver, a driver for the client computer and a driver for the printer server. These installation instructions will be available for free. If you use the HP LaserJet Pro 4500 series II on Windows 7, let Winkprinting know by leaving a comment below, on Facebook or e-mailing info@winkprinting.com .

Brother Global Support:If this is a Brother machine (printr/receiving), I am not familiar with the SNMP or other communication mechanisms between "back-end" and "front-end" functions. For example, I am not familiar with backend communicating data to or from the front-end. However, when I visit the Brother main site, they recommend that the front-end has to be on the Brother [printr] machine. AFAIK, there should be a standard communications protocol for communication between the front-end and back-end. When I upgraded to the latest 64bit windows, Brother never mentioned anything about SNMP. But I do see a driver update available for windows 7. 5ec8ef588b
