the purpose of the handbook is to provide an integrative approach to nonverbal communication in human interactions, and presents quantitative, qualitative, and conversational approaches to understand nonverbal communication. the volume includes both reviews and original research to draw attention to both the important areas of research, as well as to what has been done. the nonverbal communication (nvc) chapter presents a conceptual framework that integrates recent findings from all disciplines, including anthropology, economics, linguistics, psychology, and sociology, to identify the nonverbal behaviors that are related to the development of human social relationships. a review of four main conceptions of social communication, namely, reciprocal exchange, managerial control, emotional communication, and nonverbal information feedback, is offered to identify behaviors that are relevant to such conceptions. the chapter also examines two processes that occur between two people, relationship development and situation change, to identify the ways in which people are drawn into interpersonal relationships and are confronted by situations that have changed in some way. for example, the chapter provides a summary of the main aspects of situational change, including social hierarchies, problem solving, dialogue, and private states of arousal. the chapter introduces two principles of nvc: relational orientation and relational differentiation. the former is concerned with processes of relating and role taking that occur across the development of the relationship. the second is concerned with attributing others' nonverbal communication within a dyadic interaction to a particular person in the interaction, and includes two types of nonverbal differentiation: (1) person of reference and (2) person of attribution. this is followed by a discussion of key theorists and researchers in the field of nvc, including hall and brennan, as well as others in the chapters that follow. (nn) an additional resource for students and teachers dealing with the resources and topics mentioned in this chapter is the companion book, nvc in human interaction: an integrative approach, edited by anthony p. j. moloney (2012), available through the george mason university center for research in psychophysiology . 5ec8ef588b
