in addition to the automatic cleaning and organization of your data, you can also use recap in an entirely manual way by dragging and dropping your models into the software. this allows you to break the structure into manageable pieces, transform the data, or perform custom processing using the powerful features of recap. once you have cleaned and classified your data, you can arrange it in an easy-to-use grid. the user interface of this tool is very intuitive and offers a great range of functions. for example, the grid can show you exactly where a model is located on the screen. you can use the grid to zoom in on the model and then get a view of the smallest part, a large section, or the entire model. another powerful feature of recap is its unique suite of filters. these allow you to select and modify objects in a model using textures, colors, and other attributes. you can apply a brown roof to a building, or paint the model green so you can see it under a grassy meadow. you can even use filters to increase or decrease the size of objects based on their color. when working with data from a photogrammetric survey, recap offers automatic projection correction. this is a common way of transforming your data from the coordinate system in which it is collected to the coordinate system you can use for visualization. for example, if you use a survey data set from the field, then you might have data in a one-degree latitude-longitude grid, but you might need the data to be in a one-meter grid. another way to make your data usable is to perform transform functions. using recap's modeling tools, you can transform models from one coordinate system to another. for example, you can move a model from the world coordinate system into a project coordinate system or from a project to the world coordinate system. or you can change the scale of a model. 5ec8ef588b
