looks good, in a typical horror movie, every camera you see, is a taser. wish the director would have blown that whole thing up and added a bunch of girl moments. its like the guy sat in a room and watched too many horror movies or something. one of the more recent movies that would have benefited more from this is 2014s the conjuring. 1. the ghosts look like theyre warped from the trenches of war and the mountains of asia. theyre not well made and theyre not particularly scary. the directors got big but its so clear they just didnt have a lot of time to do it. some of the voices make it look like its fake. theyre not very creepy, either. it ish the longest ten minutes of your life. thats why they added more ghosts. i dont know if anyone has ever complained about a havent seen this before movie but they havent seen it before. 2. its a stupid movie. and i mean that in the nicest way possible. it rehashes several scenes from the first film and then throws in another movie to make up for its lack of originality. and its a plot thats been done many times. why does this poor kid have a taser rifle? is he trying to prove something? and why does he have a toy gun? these young folk are some pretty dumb characters. but at least the movie wasnt predictable. this review was written when the movie was in theaters. i read some reviews afterwards, and it seems like this movie has been criticized for being just like the other sequels. i didnt see it that way. i consider this sequel to the 2nd movie in the series to be one of the best horror movies i have ever seen. although this is a follow up to the first 2 movies and not the original japanese flick, it feels totally original. its original scary in a totally different way, and it works for the most part. many people dont know how to translate scary to english, and they are missing out.
