specification](http://www.adobe.com/content/help/en/acrobat_extensions/acrobat_extensions_4.html) to transform the html-based website to a pdf-based one. this way, we don't need to care about the extra http request over and above a regular html website (remember when somebody thought http/2 would solve everything?) but it's not just that, the whole thing is a really clever hack using html5's history api and the `pushstate` method. to help you get the feel of the experience, i've written a little test application that creates epubs from html pages and puts them online. the test app can easily be run on any html page. just go to the experiment page and follow the links. 5ec8ef588b
