For example, at least one such adaptation planning strategy, SPAN (Short-Term Adaptation Planning Framework), was developed and applied by a partnership of philanthropic donors, university researchers, planners, and state and federal governments, such as, for example, the Australian government's Sir Roland Wilson Foundation's P-45. SPAN was developed and applied in the USA between 2009 and 2014 (Simon et al., 2015). Active adaptation planning can be challenging for political leaders who may not have an understanding of risk climate and other local complexities.

Resilient, adaptable plans, therefore, should be aligned to social and physical realities on the ground.

Several examples of these adaptive community resilience infrastructure, or adaptive planning frameworks for coastal and urban adaptation are provided in Box 5.2 (Baines et al., 2013; Marriott et al., 2016; Kiribati Climate Finance Coalition and FMO-DTI Consortium, 2016; UN OCHA, 2016; Kapteyn et al., 2017). Planning for coastal adaptation in New South Wales, Australia, has been an intensive, work-intensive, and challenged process. The New South Wales government agency responsible for managing risks from flooding, the Office of Water, has well understood the problem of rapid SLR in the Sydney region (Wight, 2000). Planning for coastal adaptation in New South Wales commenced in the early 21st century with development of coastal adaptation policy and a plan for managing risk from coastal floods (Sampson and McRae, 2004). The process of managing risk from coastal floods has continued over the next two decades, and NSW coastal development patterns have responded to the policy, planning and development process. These responses have included the construction of sandy beaches (e.g. Moreton Bay), stormwater management infrastructure (e.g. Bestec), and more resilient planning and building techniques (e.g. sea walls).
