You must first make sure that your image is in "RGB color space" before clicking "Save for Web" or "Save for iOS device." Adobe doesn't mention this, and a quick perusal of the previous version will show you that there isn't a way to change this setting, so allow me to be the first to bring awareness to this! This will save you from getting cropped when uploading the image or displaying it elsewhere online. Did you enable this option before? If not, you'll have to use the option within the Preferences menu to choose the correct option for the current image you're editing. This automatically applies the setting to every image you edit in Lightroom 5, or you can edit the settings once and apply them permanently. This new feature allows to select an image from the video editing software to assist you in detecting the picture you want to edit, rather than having to waste valuable editing time and acting manually on unwanted files. This also allows you to choose a different picture using the exact same tool, stage, transparency stack, and adjustment, in much less time. This allows you to preview images and video before you click the cropped photo button. You can then choose the degree of cropping you want to include, evaluate what edits you will make, and determine whether you want to release it or keep it as a sample. When you activate Lightroom 5, and choose to import your images from your camera, you can activate Full Dynamic Range. Unlike Camera RAW, which doesn't really support HDR images, Lightroom is already updated for HDR. This feature has been long awaited - iOS users can have "glarg" grips on HDR, and Photographers can now edit HDR at a greater level of quality.
