Despite enjoying an impressive run of results in 2016, including an unlikely title success in Hungary, Red Bull's contract is not up for discussion this year. "We've always said in the Red Bull family that we'll work for 18 months," Horner told the official Formula 1 website. "We'll come to a decision in July, but as we've said before, we'll be looking to the next year rather than this one. "I would think that's for obvious reasons that we'll be looking to the 2018 car at that stage of the year. "We'll have a look at [the 2017] car but that doesn't mean you can call it a programme yet. "You don't make decisions on a programme until you have a full programme ready." Red Bull's performance in 2016 was fuelled by engine-maker Renault. It effectively won its second title in a row last year but the relationship is not yet resolved and as a result its engine options for 2017 are now unknown. It has signed a deal with Honda to be the exclusive engine supplier for the Japanese manufacturer in 2017 but the exact details of the contract have not yet been announced.1. I'm in search of a replacement for my current system, which is a bit slow. Currently Elasticsearch comes to mind, as it is exactly what I need. My main concern is that it has the same SQL Server backend, i.e. will it be able to index and query the database? A: Couchbase Server is an option for solving your problem. It is similar to ElasticSearch in some aspects (SQL Indexing), and it is more performant than ElasticSearch in some other aspects (SQL Queries). Couchbase Server can index tables from SQL Server, PostgreSQL and MySQL. There are some aspects where it is less performant than ElasticSearch, but you should be able to make it work for you. You can also try Kismatic, which is a C*-like object store where the data is stored in an ElasticSearch-like index. If you end up with Couchbase Server or Kismatic, you can always move away from it later. ST.
