We took a field trip to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in May 2011, where we saw the "I Am Anne Frank" documentary, as well as the Anne Frank exhibit and bookstore. Anne Frank's diary is full of illustrations of Nazi propaganda, including posters of the Reich's supposed benefits and beautiful photos of girls that read: "Das Fritsch geht hier vorbei!" ("The Fritsch passes here!") to the sound of military marching music. When I was very young I didn't understand what that meant. I was just curious about what it was all about. It makes me think of a scene in The Shining where it shows the room where Grady's brother stashed his little girl and doesn't want her to come out. The exhibit shows the impact of the Holocaust on the rest of the world and how it affected Anne and her family. We learned that the only person that Anne Frank's parents allowed to write a letter to them after they went into hiding was Anne's friend Margot. The family had to write this letter to convince Margot that they were really in hiding, not in a luxury home, and that they weren't just pretending. This letter shows what happened to Anne's life after she and her sister went into hiding. It was horrifying to read about the atrocities they experienced. The really disturbing part was the part about Anne's parents finding her diary and learning that Anne and Margot had written about their experiences. There were also many horrifying photos of people being burned alive, including Anne's mother and father. When I went back in to the museum years later, I knew how many people were killed because of those photos. The exhibit also had a very moving movie where we saw actual footage from the Netherlands during the Holocaust. It showed footage of the people who were captured by the Nazis. They showed footage of Anne and her mother as they went into hiding, and the film became so
