Exclusive: first look at "The Hunters," Steve Buscemi's new crime thriller Steve Buscemi is perhaps the only actor besides the late John Cusack who can play the Nice Guy and the Bad Guy at the same time. Sure, he's played the latter in nearly as many movies as the former, but no movie has better highlighted his ability to straddle the divide between the mean and the kind. The human condition often comes down to a struggle between good and evil, and Buscemi thrives on depicting how we are all complex pieces of work, between our better angels and our downward natures. In the new crime thriller The Hunters, he stars as an unlucky-in-love cop who gets drawn into a desperate situation involving a pair of robbers, a legendary pair of bank robbers played by Oscar-winning screenwriter William Goldman. The movie was shot by cinematographer Willy Kurant, who previously worked with Buscemi on Gus Van Sant's Paranoid Park. In a new interview with EW, Buscemi gives a first look at his newest role. He explains that while the character of Travis Hamilton is a stand-in for a person, it's really about all of us: "It's about an unluckiness, and in this world, if you're unlucky enough, you might find yourself with a kind of talent. And sometimes talent is like a luxury, because to get that kind of talent in a way that's powerful and had consequence, you're going to find yourself up against some of the most dangerous people in the world. And I'm lucky to be in a position where I can knock these guys out. But I'm not a fighter. And so you have
