Finally, let's discuss the fact that libraries are now auto-created in the new version. Unlike the previous versions, you don't have to create a new one. Instead, you'll see an existing Libraries panel under the Albums menu option. Wherever you were creating a new library, the new Lightroom will promptly create a new library with all of your existing images. In addition to that, the new Lightroom lets you select layers and add actions that you can download without the hassle of duplicating your original files by hand. You can create a new channel, you can duplicate the image, you can merge a selection you've created from a previous version. All these features are covered in Adobe's Help section. The latest Lightroom 5 has also supported more image formats, including JPEG 2000, including X3, and even the TIFF 8.0 format. Adobe says Lightroom 5 has "a visual oomph and productivity-enhancing capabilities beyond what you expect from a RAW converter," but, apart from a few new features that are not included in Lightroom 4, I just don't see it.
